

What is Liquidity?

Are your investments liquid or illiquid? When a holding is liquid, it simply means you can sell it anytime the market in which it trades is open for business, without losing your proverbial shirt in the exchange. If it's illiquid, you cannot sell it, at least not for anything near what it's worth.

Degrees of Liquidity

Cash and cash equivalents (such as checking or savings accounts) are the most liquid assets of all. All day, every day, you can almost always find somebody who will gladly give you something relatively worthwhile in exchange for your cash.

At the other end of the spectrum, some investments are highly illiquid, which means your ability to trade in and out of them whenever you please is strictly limited.

For example, many hedge funds and similar closely held vehicles may routinely impose lockup periods, during which you are prohibited from selling your investment. You may be prohibited from withdrawing any of your money until you've owned the holding for at least a year, plus your ability to withdraw funds after that may be limited to specific windows of opportunity such as once per quarter or twice per year.

Also, normally liquid investments can become illiquid under duress. As Ben Carlson observed on his Wealth of Common Sense blog, the following adage applies so well, it's become a bit cliché: "Liquidity is like oxygen. You don't notice that you need it until it's not there."

To cite an extreme example, during the September 11th 2001 attacks, the New York Stock Exchange and NASDAQ markets did not open for business that Tuesday; they remained closed until the following Monday. During that time, investors could not trade on either exchange, effectively rendering most of their investment portfolio illiquid for those four days.

Individual securities or sectors can also shift dramatically from liquid to illiquid, especially if investor panic sets in. An example is when the bottom dropped out on the Collateralized Debt Obligation (CDO) market in 2007, contributing to the subsequent global financial crisis.

Finding Middle Ground

Between these extremes of highly liquid/illiquid holdings, you'll find most of the investments that are most familiar to you. Mutual funds; exchange-traded funds (ETFs); stocks and bonds; and similar publicly held, exchange-traded securities are typically relatively liquid. They don't flow in and out of your accounts as freely as cash, but even in turbulent markets you can usually sell them in a same-day transaction. (Mutual funds trade once daily at the end of the trading day. Individual securities and ETFs trade at prices that fluctuate throughout the day.)

It's also worth noting, some investments can be more or less liquid or illiquid, depending on how you hold them. Real estate is a prime example.

- If you own a piece of property directly, it's relatively illiquid. Even in a stable market, it can take days, weeks, or months to sell your property once you're ready to do so.
- A non-traded Real Estate Investment Trust (REIT) may be at least as challenging to unload whenever you please. Typically, the non-traded REIT's board — not you — will decide when and how trading is permitted.

- A publicly traded REIT mutual fund or ETF is usually as liquid as any other mutual fund or ETF. Even though the fund's underlying holdings may be relatively illiquid, you can usually sell your shares in that fund whenever public markets are open for business.

Liquidity: Part of the Plan

Bottom line, cash (and cash equivalents) is the closest you come to having a completely liquid asset. This means it's important to have plenty of it on hand to cover near-term spending needs. We recommend budgeting for expected expenses as well as the inevitable surprises.

That said, cash will only take you so far. It's highly likely to lose rather than gain worth over time, as inflation eats away its spending power.

As such, a degree of illiquidity—or the inability to convert an investment back into cash whenever you please—is essential to building wealth. It's the stuff from which investment returns are made.

We suggest managing liquidity as one consideration among many, achieving a balance that's right for you. Maintain enough liquidity to ensure you're never forced to sell a less-liquid investment just to get at the cash. Accept a degree of illiquidity in your soundly structured portfolio, to judiciously seek premium market returns over the long-term. Understand when illiquidity is essential to pursuing higher returns, versus when you're just taking on extra risk, without much else to show for it.

Until next time, no regrets!

David Bromelkamp
President and CEO

Headlines

- We had a wonderful time at the Allodium Investment Forum on January 23, 2020. We discussed the question "Is Your Brain Wired to be a Good Investor?" Allodium team members participated in a round table panel.
- Congratulations go to Kari Cedergren for recently earning the Certified Divorce Financial Analyst designation (CDFA®).
- Allodium was pleased to welcome one new client into the firm during the fourth quarter of 2019.
- Our office will be closed April 10 and May 25 for company holidays.

Note: To find out more about Allodium's breaking news, please visit our website: www.allodium.com.

In the short run, the market is a voting machine. In the long run, it is a weighing machine.

Benjamin Graham

NEW EMPLOYEE SPOTLIGHT:

Derek Van Calligan

Role at Allodium: Investment Consultant

Joined firm on: December 2, 2019

Hometown: Sheboygan, Wisconsin

Favorite movie: The Revenant

Favorite book: Killing Lincoln by Bill O'Reilly

Favorite TV show: The Office

Favorite food(s): Seafood, any kind of seafood

Favorite news source: CNBC

Favorite place in Twin Cities: Smack Shack

Favorite gadget/technology: My Apple watch

Favorite activity: Anything outdoors (hiking, fishing, hunting, downhill skiing)

Favorite music: Country

Person I admire most: My grandfathers. Both of them took risks to start their own businesses and now they are financially secure in retirement.

What I'm most thankful for: My family and friends. My friends, and in particular my girlfriend, made my move up here to the Twin Cities from Denver as stress free as possible.

WE APPRECIATE YOUR INTRODUCTIONS

To optimize our objectivity and avoid conflicts of interest, we are a fee-only registered investment advisor that is completely independent from banks, brokerage firms and other financial product providers. If you know someone who may be looking for this type of objective investment advice, please contact Dave Bromelkamp at 612-230-3702 or dbromelkamp@allodium.com to arrange a friendly, no-obligation introduction.

Steward is published quarterly by Allodium Investment Consultants. Please contact Ilona Avraamides at 612-230-3711 or iavraamides@allodium.com if you have any comments about this publication or wish to be added to or removed from our mailing list.

Recent and Upcoming Events

February 27, 2020 and beyond...

David Bromelkamp will be speaking at a live national webinar which will be presented by Lorman Education Services. The course is eligible for continuing education credits for accounting and legal professionals beginning on February 27, 2020. The presentation may also be helpful for trustees or board members for nonprofit organizations. Let us know if you are interested in signing up.

April 22, 2020

Join us for our 2020 Spring Wealth Management Workshop. The topic will be organizing your finances and life. We will cover strategies for simplifying and decluttering. More details will be coming soon.

For more information about these events, please contact Ilona Avraamides at (612) 230-3711 or iavraamides@allodium.com.

ALLODIUM
INVESTMENT CONSULTANTS

© 2020 Allodium Investment Consultants

Allodium Investment Consultants, LLC ("Allodium") is an SEC registered investment adviser with its principal place of business in the state of Minnesota. This newsletter is limited to the dissemination of general information pertaining to its investment advisory/management services and is not intended to provide investment, tax, legal or other advice. While taken from sources deemed to be accurate, the information contained herein is subject to change, and Allodium makes no representations about its accuracy, completeness or appropriateness for any given situation and disclaims any liability arising from use of or reliance on this information. Client satisfaction results and recognition by publications should not be construed as a guarantee of certain results when Allodium is engaged for investment advisory services, nor should it be construed as a current or past endorsement for Allodium by any of its clients. For additional information about Allodium, including fees and services, please request our disclosure statement as set forth on Form ADV using the contact information herein. Please read the disclosure statement carefully before you invest.